and knowledge for their own sake which the Greeks possessed so strongly.

Philosophy (including pure science) can only be hampered by utilitarian motives, since it demands a greater degree of abstraction from the world of immediate experience, wider generalization and a freer movement of the reason in the sphere of pure concepts than submission to practical ends will allow.

Philosophy did not arise from a demand for the necessities or amenities of human life. Rather was the satisfaction of those demands a precondition of its existence.

Aristotle: Philosophy has its origin in wonder.

History supports this conclusion, for it was after the chief necessities not only for life but for an easy life that the search for this intellectual
